The practice of weaving sturdy tsumugi cloth from spun silk has long been handed down in regions across Japan. From the Edo period (1603–1868), especially, such unadorned or simply striped fabrics were widely used in everyday attire. In recent years, the artistic merit of handwoven tsumugi textiles has been revisited in unique designs created with modern sensibilities.

A specialist in tsumugi weaves, Murakami Ryōko expands on the conventional canon of striped and yarn-dyed designs with her use of discontinuous weft patterns known as tsuzure-ori. By working weft threads of different colors from either side of her loom and crossing them to "meet and separate" before weaving them back in the opposite direction, she forms outlines and shapes patterns with a painterly, and sometimes graphic, touch.

Murakami prepares her own botanical dyes to color her threads and finds inspiration for her innovative designs in the ever-changing scenery and palette of the natural world. Her masterful contributions to the art of tsumugi silk weaving were recognized by Japan's national government in 2016 when she was named a holder of the specialized body of techniques that sustain this Important Intangible Cultural Property.

This film follows Murakami as she creates a new kimono entitled "Light of the Moon." The camera intimately reveals the process from her initial drafting of the design to the creation of her colored threads and onward to the actual weaving of the fabric and construction of the kimono, each task performed meticulously by Murakami herself.

Murakami Ryōko

A native of Akita prefecture in northeastern Japan, Murakami Ryōko was born in 1949. She studied graphic design at Tokyo Zokei University, then apprenticed herself to the summgi textile artist Shimura Fukumi, under whom she trained for five years. Murakami then opened her own weaving and dyeing studio in Kyoto. In 2006 she was recognized by Kyoto's prefectural government for her mastery of tsumugi silk weaving; the following year she received the Medal with Purple Ribbon for her accomplishments. In 2016 Murakami, like her mentor Shimura before her, was recognized by the national government as a holder of the specialized body of techniques required to create tsumugi, an Important Intangible Cultural Property.
